

The Importance of Online Sales Methods to Kentucky Rural Small Sellers

The Typical Kentucky Rural Seller Uses Many Sales Methods, But Online Sales are Disproportionately Important to Rural Sellers Compared to Sellers Generally

Background

In 2021, the Connected Commerce Council (3C) commissioned a survey of two thousand American small businesses that sell products to learn how they sell, where they sell, and what sales support services they value.

Through that research, we learned that even the smallest product sellers are adaptable, finding customers everywhere, using brick-and-mortar stores, seller-branded online shops, online marketplaces like Amazon and eBay, and apps like Facebook and Instagram. We called the report “Super Selling” to highlight the flexibility, intensity, and exhilaration of entrepreneurs innovating to connect with customers and grow a business.

This month we published our first comparative study, about small rural sellers, including sellers in Kentucky. We asked many of the same questions to compare how Kentucky rural sellers are similar to - or different from - the U.S. national average. We also asked new questions to help us understand the unique rural commerce environment.

Executive Summary

In many ways, rural sellers are the same as all sellers. Both use several different methods to reach customers - online and offline, wholesale and marketplaces, and direct-to-consumer apps. Every sales method has competitors vying for sellers’ allegiance, and there is no one-size-fits-all or dominant solution. For example, Amazon’s marketplace may be the most popular, but other marketplaces are almost as popular, and the vast majority of Amazon sellers also sell on other marketplaces and through other methods.

In other ways, Kentucky rural sellers are markedly different. For example, while the most popular sales methods for small sellers generally are traditional brick and mortar and wholesaling, for Kentucky rural sellers the most popular methods are online marketplaces (52%) and web stores (49%). We believe that rural areas' lower population density requires further travel distances for traditional sales trips, i.e., wholesaling, so rural sellers find it more efficient to utilize online sales channels to reach distant customers. We're confident that many Kentucky rural sellers are "online first."

Kentucky Rural SMB Sellers vs. All SMB Sellers Nationally

	All SMB Sellers	Kentucky Rural SMB Sellers

All Online Revenue As % Of Total Revenue	54%	47%

Kentucky Rural Sellers Use a Variety of Sales Methods - And All Are Competitive

Kentucky rural sellers use a variety of sales methods, including the following (in order of popularity):

Online Web Stores

Online Marketplaces

Brick and Mortar

Offline Marketplaces

Wholesale

The typical Kentucky rural seller (54%) uses at least 3 sales methods to sell their product.

Many of the sales methods are very competitive, and rural sellers have several good choices. For example: A seller's online web store might be hosted by Shopify, Squarespace, Wix, or another platform, and they may sell on multiple online marketplaces, including eBay, Etsy and Amazon.

How do Kentucky Rural Sellers Succeed in Distant Markets?

Over half of Kentucky rural small business sales (54%) are made locally, in the immediate area of where a business is primarily located. Of the remaining sales, 16% are within the state, 25% are outside the state, but within the U.S., and 5% are outside the country.

Kentucky rural sellers said that business-owned web stores (37%) and online marketplaces (31%) are among the most effective distant sales methods.

This speaks to the importance of online sales channels to reach distant markets - which historically were reachable only through wholesaling. Today, rural sellers can start their business online and reach local and distant markets - including international markets - simultaneously.

Conclusion: For Kentucky Rural Sellers, Online Commerce is Disproportionately Important and Competition is Strong 3C's founder grew up in a rural community with fewer than 2,000 people, where small businesses sold only locally. Today, it is not an overstatement to say the entire world is open for Kentucky's rural sellers, especially those that utilize low-cost integrated digital platforms and tools to extend their reach and sell their products.

Rural small business leaders paint a very clear picture of diversity (many sales methods), competition (many choices within each sales method), opportunity (nearly half their sales are to distant customers), and optimism. There is no evidence that Kentucky rural sellers lack options, and there is no evidence that Congress forcing changes to online retail platforms will benefit small rural sellers.
